Safety Information

All participants should be aware of the safety concerns of high altitudes! The increased elevation can cause illness if the body is not properly hydrated and protected from sun exposure. It is not possible to know in advance if you will become ill when traveling to a high altitude. However, certain groups are at increased risk including: people who exercise or drink alcohol before adjusting to the change in altitude; people who have a medical problem that affects breathing, or people who have a prior history of high altitude illness. Wolf Creek Pass is over 10,000 feet in elevation and has dramatically thinner air than Pagosa Springs. To avoid altitude sickness, be sure to stay hydrated. Drinking lots of water will be the best way to prevent altitude sickness or dehydration. Bring at least 1 liter of water per person to the top of the pass, especially if you plan on hiking at Treasure Falls or driving up the Continental Divide Trail. Reduce caffeine and alcohol intake as these will only dehydrate the body more!

Due to the high altitude, the sunburn risk increases dramatically. Always wear sunscreen SPF 30+ sunblock, especially if you will be out for more than a few minutes. This is especially important on top of Wolf Creek Pass and while soaking in the Hot Springs!

All participants of Drive 4 Corners must read and sign the waiver of liability (attached) to assume all risks involved in the weekend. Taking preventive measures is the best way to ensure your trip to Pagosa Springs is enjoyable! Stay hydrated, apply sunscreen, and enjoy the weekend!
